How many other health and safety studies have been submitted to the agency and claimed as CBI? Its impos dential. Last year, the Environmental Working Group reviewed more than 100 Section 8 (e) reports that had be en submitted for perfluorinated chemicals between 2007 and 2015 and found that, among the 85 percent in wh ich the chemicals name was withheld, reported health effects of exposure included death; maternal and develo pmental toxicity; degeneration and necrosis of the kidneys; chromosome aberrations; changes to the weight of t he heart, kidney, liver, thymus, spleen, prostate, ovaries and adrenal glands; lethargy; and irregular breathing. T he EPA has possessed evidence of the health effects of DuPonts C8 replacement, GenX, since at least Apri

I 2006, when DuPont filed the first of 16 Section 8 (e) reports about the chemical. Some of those reports refere nce a 2009 consent order , which The Intercept obtained through a Freedom of Information Act request. That d ocument in which the specific identity of the replacement chemical and a closely related salt molecule, their pr roduction volume, manufacturing process and sites, processing, use, and other information have been withheld a s CBI lays out the agencys many concerns about DuPonts C8 replacement. It notes, for instance, that it has ev idence that the chemical and its salt are toxic to lab animals and cause mutations in mammalian and human ce lts. The document also lays out concerns that the molecules will persist in the environment, could bioaccumulat e, and be toxic (PBT) to people, wild mammals, and birds; that there is high concern for possible environmenta

I effects over the long-term; and that has human health concerns for the PMN substances. An analysis of the 8 (e) reports, which are based on DuPonts experiments on lab animals, shows that GenX presents some of th e very same health problems that C8 does, including changes in the size and weight of animals livers and kidne ys, alterations to their immune responses and cholesterol levels, weight gain. reproductive problems, and canc er. In terms of how long theyll persist in the environment, the new chemicals are just as bad as the C8 theyre m ean to replace. Like C8, GenX is extremely stable and will likely persist indefinitely. As A. Michael Kaplan, DuP onts then-director of regulatory affairs, put it in one of the 8 (e) reports the company submitted to the EPA in 2010, The biodegradation of the test substance was 0% It will take thousands of years to break down or mayb e longer, Wang said of GenX. 3Ms ADONA, he said, will also endure indefinitely. The company claims that this replacement degrades, but actually it doesn't. Indeed, most of the new replacement PFCs or, in the case of the longer-chain molecules, the substances they degrade into wont ever break down. Were replacing a super-per sistent chemical with super-persistent chemicals. Resetting the Clock It took half a century from the introductio n of C8 into commercial use for the public to catch on about its dangers. In part because the EPA has yet to i ssue binding regulation that could require polluters to be held financially responsible for their mess, most of the contamination from that chemical is still in our environment. The earlier flame retardants that BPCs are replaci ng and the dangerous chemicals they degrade into also remain with us. Now, with the introduction of next-ge neration replacement chemicals, industry has reset the clock. But lawmakers have already missed the opportu nity to close one gaping legal hole that allows unsafe chemicals to enter the market, since neither of the bills no w being considered would require companies to submit specific safety data before new chemicals are approved for use. Nor does either bill really fix the confidentiality problem. The Senates bill would make some improvem ents on CBI, requiring the EPA to review past and future confidentiality claims that mask a chemicals identity

, as well as at least a quarter of the CBI claims for other types of information. But the House bill does not mand ate any CBI review or lay out penalties for companies that make false claims. And in one important respect, TS

CA reform could be a step backward: The House bill would allow companies to claim chemical identity in health studies as CBI. We need to reduce the emissions as fast as possible and evaluate whether uses are essential

I. To his great frustration, however, most of his colleagues who work with PFCs are still focused on C8. Stryna r and Lindstrom, the EPA researchers in North Carolina, are hoping their discoveries will spur medical resea rchers to investigate the health effects of the PFCs they discovered in the Cape Fear River. They themselves h ave begun to work on developing methods to measure the chemicals, and to test methods for removing them fr om drinking water. Their research will likely continue for years. Related: New Teflon Toxin Causes Cancer in L
